The Rev. D. R. Lucas, who had a personal acquaintance with President McKinley and is widely known on account of his connection with the Grand Army and politics, was present. He is very ill, but consented to speak. He had to be helped into the pulpit by the Rev. Mr. Philputt, and, seated in a chair, paid his tribute to the martyred President. He said he stood at the head of the coffin when President Lincoln was assassinated and thought at that time that said, Lincoln has become greater than he ever was before and is greater in the eyes of his countrymen perhaps than if he had lived. The same thought of sorrow ran through his mind when Garfield was assassinated, he said, but, like Lincoln, Garfield's greatness became greater. He said that now he thought perhaps McKinley would be even greater and that the influence he leaves behind and his untimely leath will bring the people closer together and drive the dangerous element from the land. Dr. Lucas was unable to remain for the rest of the service when he had finished and had to be taken home. The Rev. W. B. E. Treat offered prayer and Mrs. Goetz sang "The Home of the Soul." Again all heads were bowed, and as the words "I will sing you a song of that beautiful land, the far away home of the soul, where no storms ever beat on that beautiful strand" nearly every eye was moist and a solemn stillness prevailed after the hymn was finished. Mr. Osgood delivered his eulogy. He spoke of the great love of the people for the martyr, to his love for them and the grief of the people from one end of the country to the other and also in foreign lands. He compared the troubles of the individuals mentioned in the Bible who came forth from their trials stronger than before, and expressed the hope that the troubles of this Nation would awaken people to an appreciation of its need and also to the example set by Mr. McKinley, when he murmured the Lord's prayer, chanted softly the old hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee," and, just before he became unconscious, said it was God's way and His will should be done. He gave expression to fear that the success of the class to which the President's assassin belonged, no matter what punishment might be inflicted upon the prisoner, be an incentive to further action. The eulogy of the Rev. Mr. Messing, which followed the singing of "Peace, be Still," was an interesting description of the character of the President. He dwelt upon the last words of the President, and called attention to his great love for the people and his forgetfulness of self.
